Miral applied for a job placement that requires outdoor visits with the team often. Upon asking in the interview about her being available for such a role she at once agreed in order to get the job. She didn't mention it clearly that she would prefer an indoor role because she is not allowed for outdoor availability.

Q. Is it ethical for you to apply for the job without mentioning this fact? (2.5)

No, it is not ethical to apply for a Job without mentioning this fact. This leads to violation of "Professionalism" and "Clarity". She should be clear in terms of explaining her availability.

For the making of a remote control manual, Ali used the manual of another company's remote control and some of its data. In his opinion normally the manual of all remotes contain similar data. He didn't ask for permission from that company to use the required data. Also, he didn't look into the copy right and legal issues.

Q. If it is unethical, is there any ethical way it could have been done? (2.5)

It is not ethical, the ethical way of doing it that she should mention it that he copied it. He can give company the credit by "proper refrencing" He should ask "permission" from both parties.
